Preferred Citation: (Box Number, Folder Number/Name), Alabama Black Sacred Harp Collection, 88-020, Center for Popular Music, Middle Tennessee State University, Murfreesboro, Tennessee
Provenance and Acquisition Information:
Materials were given by H.J. Jackson in three installments, the first in October of 1988 where materials were donated as well as purchased by the Center. The second installment was in June of 1990, where the material was Center-generated. The third installment was donated in June of 1992.

The four analog field recordings (TCA 0072A/E) were made by Center audio archivist Bruce Nemerov, September 1988; the digital master tapes (TCD 0072A/C) and analog cassette reference copies thereof were made in the Center lab from the field recordings at a later date. The fifth analog cassette tape (TCA 0072E) and all three video cassette tapes were made from originals lent for copying by H.J. Jackson of Ozark, AL. The photographs were made by James Bryan in September 1988.

Agency History/Biographical Sketch:
Judge J. Jackson (March 12, 1883, Montgomery County, Alabama - April 7, 1958, Ozark, Alabama) was an American sacred harp composer, songwriter, and educator. His 1934 publication The Colored Sacred Harp was later recognized by scholars such as Doris Dyen and New Grove writer Joe Dan Boyd as an important document of early twentieth-century shape note singing practice.

Jackson was raised in a family of sharecroppers and obtained little formal education as a child. When he was sixteen years old, he left home and took work as a farmhand in Dale County, Alabama, where he settled and eventually earned enough to become a farmer and landowner on his own. He took an interest in the Sacred Harp tradition around the time he moved to Dale County, but his new employer would not allow him to attend the local singing schools, so he learned the technique from his peers instead. He was baptized into Christianity in 1902 and also married that year, and in 1904 began composing lyrics to shape note songs. By the early 1920s, he had moved on to teaching and composing Sacred Harp music, in addition to organizing conventions for the music in the southeast United States.

In 1934, during the Great Depression, Jackson self-published a 77-song compilation titled The Colored Sacred Harp, which included 18 of his own compositions (17 both words and music, and one music only) and 24 pieces he altered or arranged. Among the pieces in this collection is the Jackson composition "My Mother's Gone," which was eventually adopted into the Cooper revision in the late twentieth century. To finance the publication of The Colored Sacred Harp, Jackson and an associate, Bishop J.D. Walker, paid out of pocket to print 1,000 copies of the text; Jackson then sold the book door-to-door and via singing conventions and educational programs.- Wikipedia contributors. "Judge Jackson."
